

The Practitioner's Kit

Hygiene, safety, patch testing, and the discipline that must exist before a single hand touches a face

Learning Objectives

- Set up and maintain a hygienic, professional treatment space
- Correctly sanitise tools, surfaces, and hands between every single client
- Conduct a proper patch test and know its non-negotiable waiting period
- Assemble the essential kit every Amber practitioner works from

The module no one finds glamorous, and everyone needs

A brilliant, artful facial performed with unsanitised tools is not a brilliant facial. It is a health risk wearing an elegant apron. Amber's name is worth nothing if it is ever attached to an infection that proper hygiene would have prevented.

Skill is what a client sees. Hygiene is what protects her when she isn't looking. Both are the job.

The hygiene protocol

- Hand hygiene. Thorough hand washing before every client, followed by sanitiser; fresh gloves for extraction or broken skin.
- Tool sanitation. Metal tools sterilised between every use — never simply wiped. Anything that cannot be properly sterilised must be single-use.
- Surface and linen protocol. Treatment beds disinfected between every client; fresh linens for each appointment.
- Product hygiene. Spatulas to remove product from jars; never double-dip; single-use applicators.

Every step, every client, without exception

The four-part hygiene protocol repeated before every single appointment.

The patch test — never skipped, never rushed

Before introducing any new product or active to a client's face, a patch test is mandatory, regardless of confidence. Apply a small amount to the inner forearm and wait a full 24 to 48 hours before use on the face.

The Origin BubbleTurkey · The Hammam · Communal care

The Room Built for Cleanliness and Trust

Step into an old Ottoman hammam and the first thing you notice is the order. Marble floors, heated from beneath, kept scrupulously clean by an attendant whose entire profession was the maintenance of exactly this: a space so trustworthy that strangers could lie down together, unguarded.

The tellak or natir worked by a strict, unspoken order: steam to open the skin, a rough kese cloth to exfoliate, soap worked into foam, and rinsing with fresh water from a marble basin for every guest.

This was never only about the skin. Cleanliness in the hammam was the foundation of trust itself.

The principle

Long before germ theory existed, hammam culture had already built a professional discipline around hygiene as the precondition for trust — clean tools, clean surfaces, clean water for every guest.

Why this belongs here: Every sanitised tool and fresh linen you prepare is the modern version of exactly what the hammam understood centuries ago — trust and cleanliness are the same thing.

Building your kit

Sanitiser and disposable gloves; disposable spatulas and applicators; a sterilisation solution or unit for metal tools; a magnifying lamp for consultation; fresh linens; a patch-test kit; and a written hygiene log, dated and signed after every client.
