

Global Business Models

Korea, Japan, America, Europe, and India's own home-parlour tradition, taught by name

Learning Objectives

- Name and describe five global beauty-business models by name and origin
- Distinguish the structural logic behind each model
- Identify elements from each model worth borrowing, regardless of your own chosen structure
- Explain why business models, like technique, deserve to be studied by name rather than generically

Business models have heritage too

Every earlier course's Module Twelve taught named regional and global techniques rather than treating them as interchangeable. This module applies the same standard to business structure — the way a practice is built and run carries as much cultural specificity as the service performed inside it.

The Korean franchise and chain model

South Korea's beauty industry has built a globally influential model around standardised, franchised chains offering consistent quality and rapid multi-location scaling, alongside a fast, research-driven product innovation cycle — a structure prioritising consistency and scale over individual practitioner autonomy.

Japanese omotenashi

Omotenashi — a Japanese hospitality philosophy roughly meaning selfless, anticipatory service — shapes many Japanese salons around meticulous attention to a client's unstated needs, treating service quality itself as the primary differentiator over aggressive marketing or rapid scale.

The American booth-rental model

The United States popularised the booth or chair rental structure described in Module Two at national scale, prioritising individual practitioner independence and direct client ownership over centralised salon branding.

The European maison and atelier model

European, particularly French, beauty and fashion tradition built the maison (house) and atelier model — a single, prestige-branded name under which specialised artisans work collectively, prioritising heritage, exclusivity, and brand prestige over rapid multi-location expansion.

India's neighbourhood parlour tradition

India's own widespread neighbourhood "beauty parlour" tradition — frequently a home-based or small-storefront business, often woman-owned and deeply embedded in a specific local community — represents a genuinely distinct model prioritising accessibility, personal relationship, and low overhead over scale or prestige branding, and deserves recognition by name alongside the four models above, not dismissal as merely "informal."

Practical Activity · Borrow Deliberately

For your own hypothetical business model chosen in Module Two, identify one specific element from each of the five traditions in this module that you would deliberately borrow, and explain why.
