

The Consultation Room

Matching scent to occasion, the budget conversation, and holding a boundary on allergy risk

Learning Objectives

- Match a fragrance recommendation to a client's personality, season, and venue
- Handle a fragrance and jewelry rental-versus-purchase budget conversation transparently
- Hold a firm boundary when pressured to use a product flagged as an allergy risk
- Explain why occasion-matching is a professional skill, not a matter of simple taste

Matching scent to the day itself

A heavy, resinous oriental fragrance suited to a winter evening reception can feel overwhelming at a bright, outdoor daytime mandap, just as a light citrus scent suited to an afternoon garden ceremony can feel thin and forgettable at a formal evening event. Ask directly about the season, the time of day, and the venue — indoor or outdoor, intimate or large — before finalising any fragrance recommendation, treating occasion-matching with the same deliberate reasoning Module One's pyramid taught you to apply.

The rental-versus-purchase conversation

Present jewelry rental and fragrance sample-versus-full-bottle options clearly and with genuine pricing transparency, rather than defaulting to the higher-cost option without discussing it. A client choosing to rent statement jewelry for a single event and invest instead in a full bottle of a fragrance she will wear for years afterward is making a considered trade-off worth supporting, not talking her out of.

Holding the allergy boundary

If a client or a family member insists on using a fragrance or ubtan ingredient already flagged as a known allergen or reaction risk during consultation, the response must be as firm and calm as Course VI's Module Ten boundary script: "I can't use that safely on her skin, and I won't — here's a comparable option in the same family that is safe." State it plainly, without extended justification, and offer the safe alternative in the same breath.

Practical Activity · The Occasion Match

For three different hypothetical events — an outdoor daytime ceremony, an indoor evening reception, and an intimate garden engagement — recommend a fragrance family for each and explain your occasion-matching reasoning.
