

Building the Amber Edit Bridge

Take-home kits, private-label product, and pricing the retail side of this course's craft

Learning Objectives

- Explain how this course's skills bridge directly into a retail product line
- Structure a take-home client kit built from a booking's own fragrance and ubtan choices
- Price a retail add-on appropriately alongside a service booking
- Explain why this bridge exists in this course specifically, and not an earlier one

Where the service ends, the product line begins

Of everything taught across this curriculum, fragrance and ubtan are uniquely suited to travel home with a client in a bottle or a jar — unlike a haircut or a completed bridal look, a client's chosen scent or ubtan blend can be recreated, repurchased, and re-experienced long after the appointment ends. This is precisely the bridge into Amber Edit, the Atelier's product-line vertical, and why this course, uniquely among the eight, is built with that bridge in mind.

Building a take-home kit

- The signature scent. A travel-size version of the exact fragrance chosen and refined during the client's own consultation, labelled with her name and the date of her event.
- The ubtan blend. A jar of the same formulation used in her ceremony, with simple written instructions for at-home use in the weeks following.
- The touch-up essentials. A solid perfume balm and a small bindi selection matching what was used on the day, for anniversary or event use afterward.

Pricing the retail add-on

Price a take-home kit to reflect genuine product cost, packaging, and labelling time — as a value-adding option presented clearly during the consultation, never a surprise upsell added to a final invoice. A client who understands the take-home kit's value in advance, exactly as Course VI's Module Ten taught for bridal package pricing, is far more likely to purchase one happily than one confronted with it unexpectedly.

Practical Activity · Build the Kit

For a hypothetical bridal booking, build a complete take-home kit proposal including all three components and a stated price, presented as you would during an actual consultation.
