

The Finishing Kit

Bindis, jewelry handling, and the fragrance-layering tools that complete a look

Learning Objectives

- Assemble a complete bindi and jewelry-handling finishing kit
- Assemble a fragrance-layering kit spanning ittar, spray, and solid formats
- Apply correct hygiene and handling standards for shared client jewelry
- Explain why the finishing kit is assembled and checked last, not first

The kit that completes, rather than begins, the look

Everything in this kit is applied in the final minutes before a client walks out the door — which means every item in it must already be clean, sorted, and ready well before that moment arrives, with no time left to search or improvise.

- Bindi selection. A genuine range of sizes, colours, and materials — velvet, stone-embellished, and liquid bindi options — sorted by category rather than loose in one bag, to allow quick, confident selection under time pressure.
- Jewelry handling tools. A soft polishing cloth, a small jewelry tray lined with soft fabric to prevent scratching, and clean gloves for handling a client's own heirloom pieces.
- The fragrance-layering kit. A small selection of ittar in different olfactory families, a travel-size spray option, and a solid perfume balm for precise, mess-free pulse-point touch-ups later in a long event.

Jewelry hygiene between clients

Any jewelry belonging to the salon rather than the client — loaner pieces, sample bindi trays touched by multiple hands — must be wiped with an appropriate sanitising solution between uses, exactly as Course IV's Module Nine required for nail tools and Course V's Module Nine required for linens. A client's own heirloom jewelry should be handled with clean hands or gloves and returned in the same condition it arrived in, with any concern flagged to her immediately rather than discovered later.
